Color in Use

In marketing items, the primary color should always be used in some way. Secondary colors should accent this.

The brand colors should make up 90% of the image. The red and green secondary colors should be the least prominent color if and when used.
Illustrations should use brand colors accordingly and maintain a similar look and feel to the style shown below. Illustrations should always be done in brand colors and use the color hierarchy listed on page 5. This abstracted style can help the marketing be general enough that students from all age ranges, K-12 and higher education, can connect with it.

SafeUT and U of U Health
Brand Guidelines

SafeUT follows the University of Utah Health style guide, which can be found here:

https://healthcare.utah.edu/brand-and-style-guide/

Additional requirements pertaining specifically to the SafeUT brand can be found below.

Audience & Messaging

SafeUT is a crisis chat, tip, and call line that needs to be accessible and approachable to a wide age range. SafeUT is marketed towards K-12 and higher education students, parents/guardians, and educators/staff.

To indicate the broad range of challenges SafeUT helps with, avoid words such as “crisis” (which may exclude smaller but traumatic life events such as a breakup) unless they’re accompanied by a modifier such as “any-sized.”

These messages need to reach three target groups: students, parents/guardians, and educators; as well as cover two important categories: the crisis chat feature and tip line.

Phrasing

When writing “SafeUT,” there is no space between “Safe” and “UT.”

For copy and body text, “at no cost” should be used instead of “free.” Using “free” is acceptable on cards, posters, and other marketing materials.

Always use “confidential” and never “anonymous.”

Avoid using phrases such as “therapists,” which can be misleading. Instead, use the term “licensed counselors” to be more accurate.

Headlines and copy should be phrased in a way that is approachable to students.

We kindly ask to see final proof of anything that includes our logo to ensure brand guidelines are being met. Please email proof files to SafeUT@hsc.utah.edu prior to printing or publishing for review and approval.

From illustrations to posters, pass-along cards, and banners, the correct use of color, typography, and messaging will give you results like these:

Illustration & Style

Illustrations should use brand colors accordingly and maintain a similar look and feel to the style shown below. Using a series of photo treatments, we are able to maintain the hand-drawn style, while making these illustrations more approachable to frontline workers.

Choosing from a selection of people to showcase these frontline workers has been a priority to the images we source.

Frontline Words

Audience & Messaging

SafeUT Frontline focuses on three main groups within the frontline: health care providers, fire/EMS, and law enforcement. Because collateral is marketed toward a specific group of frontline workers, the messaging used is very important.

Phrasing

The phrase “A lifeline for the frontline” addresses all groups as a whole. All other messaging should be group specific.

Use “support” rather than “help” on all SafeUT Frontline marketing materials.

Include a period at the end of all SafeUT Frontline headlines.

Group-Specific Messaging

“Self-care is health care, too.”

“Live support for life supporters.”

“Taking care of the caretakers.”

“When emergency personnel have personal emergencies.”

“Get support when you’ve given all you have.”

“You’re allowed to have emergencies, too.”

“A lifeline for the line of duty.”

“For when those in blue feel more than blue.”

“Tough job? We get it.”
SafeUT Frontline has specific goals to reach three different groups within the frontline: health care providers, fire/EMS, and law enforcement. In an effort to focus on key issues each group faces, the messaging matrix was created to highlight how certain messages (i.e. depression, anxiety, PTSD) are perceived among these individual groups.
